Child & Family Studies

College of Behavioral & Community Sciences

About the program

This Certificate is designed to produce a new generation of professionals who possess the skills to identify, understand, and provide leadership in the implementation of programs for children who have mental health challenges and their families, at different developmental stages, within the contexts in which they live. This interdisciplinary program addresses policy, systemic, and administrative issues related to multi-agency service planning and delivery, and is fully available through distance learning methodologies for two primary audiences—graduate students seeking specialized training in Children's Mental Health and professionals in need of retooling in order to keep pace with the fundamental changes that have taken place in the children's mental health field.

This graduate certificate program is offered entirely online.

Admission Requirements

Applicants must have a Bachelor's Degree in a field related to human services (e.g. social work, sociology, psychology, public health, nursing, education, etc.).

Courses in this graduate certificate program may also earn credit in other graduate programs.
